Hugh Grant (1960 –)

Hugh John Mungo Grant (born 9 September 1960) is a British actor and film producer who has received a Golden Globe.

Grant achieved international stardom after appearing in Richard Curtis's successful Four Weddings and a Funeral (1994).

Within the film industry, Grant is cited as an anti-film star who approaches his roles like a character actor, and attempts to make his acting appear spontaneous.

He has been vocal about his disrespect for the profession of acting, and in his disdain towards the culture of celebrity and hostility towards the media. In a career spanning 30 years, Grant has repeatedly claimed that acting is not a true calling but just a job he fell into.

After making his debut as Hughie Grant in the Oxford-financed Privileged (1982), Grant dabbled in a variety of jobs, for instance he wrote book reviews, worked as assistant groundsman at Fulham Football Club, tried his hand at tutoring, and also wrote comedy sketches for TV shows.

Finally he created his own comedy revue called The Jockeys of Norfolk with friends Chris Lang and Andy Taylor. The group toured London's pub comedy circuit. Starting on a low note, The Jockeys of Norfolk eventually proved a hit at the Edinburgh Festival.

Grant is well known for having a very strong work ethic. He has called being a successful actor a mistake and has repeatedly talked of his hope that film stardom would just be "a phase" in his life, lasting no more than ten years. He pins his lack of interest in acting on two different thoughts: firstly, that he drifted into the job as a temporary joke at age 23 and finds it an immature way for a grown man to spend his time; and secondly, because he believes to have already given the one remarkable comic performance he had hoped to create on screen.
